Difference Between Fee-Only, Fee-Based, & Commission-Based

Understanding how an investment firm is compensated and the difference between the three main fee structures is important for any investor looking for the best investment management company to work with.

Top investment firms can work under one of the three main compensation structures, which are:

- Fee-only
- Fee-based
- Commission-based

Many investors are unfamiliar with the differences between these structures, however, there are some key distinctions between each that can impact how you feel about your investment guidance.

Fee-Only

If a top investment firm states that they are “fee-only” this means that they do not accept any commissions or incentives from third parties that sell financial products or services. Their only form of compensation is from client fees.

The fee-only pricing structure minimizes the inherent conflicts of interest that accompany the recommending and selling of investment products. A fee-only investment company is in a better position to act solely in the interest of their clients.

Fee-Based

Fee-based investment firms are also compensated by client fees, however, they are also free to accept commissions, referral fees, or other incentives from companies who provide their financial products.

Because the fee-based structure creates some potential conflict of interest, many fee-based investment firms will become fiduciaries to help offset the potential for conflict.

As a fiduciary, an investment firm is legally responsible to fully disclose any conflicts of interest and are required to put the interests of their clients ahead of their own.

Commission-Based

Investment firm advisors working with a commission-based structure will typically be compensated through commissions from purchasing and selling financial products in their clients' portfolios.

Generally, high-net-worth investors find that the unique services offered by commission-based firms provide the best investment returns and often are accompanied by “white-glove” treatment and other personalized services.
